

A full-length marble statue of a man, likely a satyr or a deity, standing and holding a goat on his shoulders. The statue is white and appears to be made of marble. It is set against a solid purple background. The statue is positioned centrally, with its body slightly turned to the left. The goat is perched on the man's right shoulder, facing right. The man's right arm is bent, holding the goat's body, while his left arm is extended downwards. The statue is mounted on a rectangular base.

SAVE THE STATUES OF VERSAILLES

By adopting a statue you allow original works to be restored and placed safely inside the Palace, as well as the creation of a replica for the gardens.

The gardens of Versailles, commissioned by Louis XIV and created by André Le Nôtre, are an extension of the lines and perspectives of the Palace and aim to reunite art and nature. The 253 sculptures they contain make Versailles one of the largest outdoor sculpture museums in the world. This sculpted white marble decoration, composed of antique statues and works by the greatest artists of the 17th century, takes visitors on a poetic journey where the gods and heroes of ancient mythology stand alongside allegorical representations of human temperament, poetic genres and the continents. Although largely untouched since its creation, this heritage admired by millions of visitors every year has suffered from adverse weather.

Enabling this heritage to continue withstanding the passage of time

The sculptures in the gardens have greatly suffered from being displayed outdoors for more than three centuries. In 2005 a large-scale restoration programme was launched thanks to the support of generous patrons. After being restored, the most fragile and damaged statues have been placed safely inside the Palace. Replicas made of marble powder now replace the seventeenth-century works in the gardens, fully respecting the design by Louis XIV.

More than 160 sculptures have been adopted since 2005!

Today there are 15 statues of white marble, made in the late 17th century and placed at the heart of the gardens, just waiting to be adopted. They must all be replaced by a replica, but ten of them are in need of restoration beforehand. You can help contribute to their preservation by adopting a statue.
