LET'S RESTORE

THE ANCIENT FACES IN

THE MARBLE COURTYARD

The busts in the Marble Courtyard, some ancient and some more recent, represent Roman figures and emperors. This extraordinary sculpted décor, exposed to the elements for over three centuries, is now threatened by the ravages of time and is in urgent need of restoration. Almost sixty busts that were particularly badly damaged or fragile have already been removed from the façades. They will be restored in our workshops and some will then be kept under cover.

Versailles, the new Rome

When Louis XIV brought his court and government to Versailles in 1682, he ordered the most prestigious antique pieces, displaying a vision of a new Rome recreated for his own glory. The Palace's Marble Courtyard, its façades decorated with almost a hundred busts resting on pedestals, is the first vision of antiquity that the visitor sees.

BUSTS LEAFLET

1 BUST OF TRAJAN

This marble bust is almost certainly a copy of an ancient bust of the emperor dating from the first quarter of the 2nd century, currently preserved in the Capitole Museum in Rome. Emperor of Rome from 98 to 117 AD, Trajan has gone down in history as the «best of the Roman emperors». His hair identifies him beyond all doubt, each emperor being represented with a specific hairstyle, in accordance with a practice confirmed under Augustus.

Not mentioned in Massou's inventory, this work will be preserved in the reserve.

2 BUST OF A ROMAN LADY

Her wavy hair, topped and held in place by a tiara, frames the elegant face of this young woman, whose identity has not yet been established. Is she a goddess or an aristocrat?

The finely traced brow bone, slim nose and delicate mouth give her a pure yet impenetrable air.

Dressed in a light tunic, her chest is emphasised by the highly elaborate folds of the drapery.

Once restored, this female bust of Carrara marble, which is not described in Massou's 1722 inventory, will be kept in storage.

3 BUST OF A ROMAN

This imposing bust by its size represents a Roman character in the strength of age, with a wide face. The curly hair, as well as the particularly abundant beard, were executed with care, each curl being well sculpt with a trepan. The bust, formed by large masses of smooth draperies, offers a striking contrast with the head. The bust covered with a tunic worked in large vertical sections, it detaches from the bust a scarf horizontally clad around the left shoulder and tied thanks to a skilful game of drapes on the right shoulder of the character. Despite its high quality of execution, this surprising bust does not correspond to any of the busts described by Massou in 1722. This bust will be restored and preserved in the Museum storeroom.

4 BUST OF A ROMAN LADY

This unidentified aristocratic lady is wearing a tiara that holds up her wavy, elaborately sculpted locks. Her face is turned slightly to the right and bears a sweet, almost melancholic expression, thus revealing the desire to individualise this portrayal. The body is clothed in a tunic, the magnificent folds of which emphasise the chest and lend this bust a wholly baroque air.

This portrayal is in keeping with the known effigies of the Empress Sabina of the Aelian dynasty, of which there are some examples in the Louvre.

Once restored, this bust will be on display in a storage area open to the public.

5 BUST OF A ROME

This bust of Rome, or Roma, is a copy of an ancient original dating from the 2nd century. It was part of Cardinal Richelieu's collection (Paris, Louvre Museum). This allegory of the city of Rome is represented here with a helmet, bare-breasted, with a piece of light drapery flowing from her left shoulder. With her neck turned slightly to the left, her unwavering and determined gaze is fixed on the horizon. The most characteristic feature is the Capitoline she-wolf, represented on both sides of her helmet in reference to the founding myth of the city of Rome.

Not indicated in the inventory of 1722, once restored this work will be preserved in the reserves.

6 BUST OF A ROMAN

This male bust has not yet been identified. However, it applies the iconography of a Roman emperor. His dress particularly underscores his status. He is wearing a breastplate concealed under a cloak held in place with a round fibula on the right shoulder. He looks quite old, as indicated by the signs of age on his face. His massive neck contributes to his imposing physiognomy. His mouth is fine and tightly drawn. He seems to have a dreamy look, which softens his expression.

Corresponding to none of the descriptions made by Massou in 1722, this bust will be preserved in the reserve once it is restored.
